

Breaklight: An Anthology Of Caribbean Poetry, Chosen

Shapes in Ice

Ice-patterns on the window have a formal, deliberate beauty, like illustrations for an Argument from Design.
Now a blade of heat from the fan begins to carve holes – a round one through which I can see the snow lying, and now again snow falling;
and a wedge-shaped one, reminding me of something seen on a journey, thirty years ago.

Windscreen wipers laboured. The beleaguered car slowly jolted through an Easter blizzard along the lakeside track; turned steeply uphill, almost blind in whiteout, to the house Nantybeddau on its hilltop. Outside, by the door, lay the stone we had heard of, an arm's length of dark snow-cruled density, wedge-shaped, on its wider end blunt incisions of a problematic alphabet.

I find my photographs, lay two side by side.
One is of the Nantybeddau brothers, three old men hunched into raincoats, sheltering in an open shed. Two are almost smiling; the third gazes off-right in meditative calm, one hand abstractedly comforting his sheepdog's nose. Huge snowflakes fleck the foreground. Even then these brothers lived, in their solitude, a present that was most men's past.
Now they have moved into memory, that in its turn fades into ultimate snows.
